I want the sale of raw milk legalised because, properly produced under sanitary conditions, it is far healthier than treated milk. Milk without its component, and natural, synergy of vitamins, minerals, fats and other nutrients, is not real milk and therefore should be called something else. Pasteurised milk must, inevitably, involve degradation of the nutritional factors inherent in raw milk, and which constitute its beneficence.

Pasteurised milk does not contain protein or calcium in a very useable form, and therefore the marketing of milk as being excellent for growth and development is misleading and dishonest.

If people want to buy raw milk, as I do, then I believe I have the right to make myself ill if it is problematic, bacterially-wise. I know that if I get sick, there's not much chance of me drinking it again. But the choice should be mine, and consumers will always have the option to drink pasteurised milk, if that is their preference.
